Introduction

The general public and the media have investigated news of the war, yet many people do not know what we are doing better after hearing this speculation. Sometimes, people come out with inaccurate information, resulting in an iceberg that creates a lot of twists and turns in the actual story. If politicians say America has not been at war for a long time, that is wrong. The concept of war is broad but straightforward.

For the first time, war is a moral pattern that signifies a straightforward state of organised conflict between two or more civil society organisations. The main reason for such conflict is an attempt at superiority, either psychologically or materially. The element of domination is fundamental to all wars in history. But throughout history, the war was waged as the best. Nowadays, we can classify war not only as unwanted but also as a moral issue.

Are there good reasons for starting a war? The issue is much deeper than it seems. The pacifists will declare that there are no valid reasons to start any war. One view is to accept a threat that is thought to be a powerful reason for war.

But in this case, some questions need to be answered. When does this threat become a significant cause of war? What are the consequences or consequences of ignoring the impending danger? How much should time pass from the time the threat arises to the point where action must be taken?

Threats can also vary. Are they essential in life? About war, we understand the threat as a threat to human existence: rare resources and shortages or conflicting ideologies. A constant feature of all forms of conflict is organised violence and the destruction of lives and property.

Nevertheless, injustice also flourishes; and has dynamics. And the question is: should people risk their lives by fighting, or should they be at risk of becoming victims?

Modern international law recognizes only two types of warfare: self-defence warfare and war-sanctioned warfare by the UN Security Council (for example, peacekeeping operations).

To summarise all this discussion, I wanted to say that Every Age has its kind of war, limitations, and unique ideas. If something is suitable for a person while that thing is essential to someone else, then there is a conflict between thinking. This creates opportunities for wars between people.
